Report into death of worker at train depot continues.
WorkSafe officers will today continue to prepare a report on the death of a worker at the Kalgoorlie train depot in southern Western Australia. Police say on Saturday morning the 34-year-old father-of-two was working on the tracks but did not get out of the path of a train which was slowly shunting up behind him. He was trapped under the train and dragged for eight metres. St John Ambulance officers arrived at the scene but were unable to save the man. WorkSafe officers flew to Kalgoorlie on Saturday night and are continuing to investigate the incident.
